ANTHS Students Develop 134 Mile Per Hour Roller Coaster!

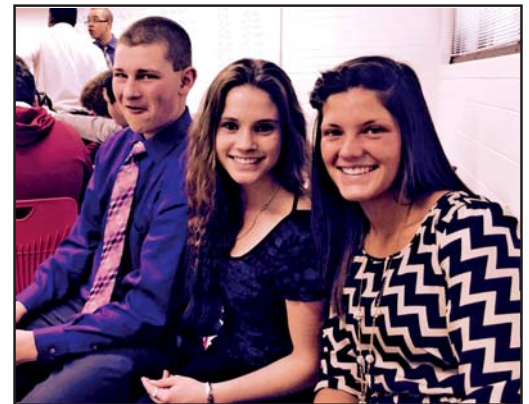

Anson New Tech's Math III students recently completed a project using quadratic modeling to design a roller coaster that would travel 134 mph. The teams were required to research roller coasters, collect data on drops and speed, and calculate a regression that was then used to determine the height of their coaster. The students used software to design a roller coaster that met the specifications and then built a functioning model.

In addition, they had to address emergency exit plans, ingress/egress patterns, and handicap-accessible issues. They had to research and develop a cost estimate for the roller coaster and determine a name and theme.

During the panel presentation the teams had to answer questions relating to the mathematics involved and demonstrate the use of graphing calculators as a modeling tool. They were required to discuss coefficients in terms of acceleration, initial velocity and initial position.
