"The Ansonia's Artistic Director, Tommy Wooten, brings this heartwarming story to life with humor, popular music, and a zest for life that only he can," said Caroline Goins, ACPC Executive Director. "This is an event you don't want to miss."

This event is free and open to the public. Doors open at 5:30 p.m. for open seating.

Statement by Anson Sheriff Scott Howell on Pistol Permits

Anson County Sheriff Scott Howell says effective immediately, pistol purchase permits will no longer be issued by any sheriff in North Carolina. The Anson County Sheriff's Office has stopped processing pistol purchase permit applications including pending applications.

All state laws regarding the issuance of pistol purchase permits by sheriffs in North Carolina were repealed on Wednesday morning, March 29 following a vote by the General Assembly to override Governor Roy Cooper's veto of Senate Bill 41, Guarantee 2nd Amendment Freedom and Protections.

This means any person who wants to purchase or transfer a handgun in North Carolina no longer has to apply to the sheriff for a pistol purchase permit. However, any person who wants to purchase a handgun through a firearms dealer will still undergo the background check required under current law and either be sold the handgun or denied sale if the background check indicates the person is disqualified from possessing a firearm.

Criminal penalties still apply for anyone that knowingly transfers a handgun to a person who may not lawfully possess the firearm (such as a convicted felon). Therefore, it is important for citizens to remember that anyone wishing to obtain or transfer any firearm, including a handgun, must still comply with Federal and State laws governing who may lawfully possess a firearm.

It is important to understand that North Carolina concealed handgun laws have NOT changed. Any person residing in Anson County wishing to carry a concealed handgun in North Carolina must still apply for and be issued a concealed handgun permit by the sheriff.

Four Wildlife Encounters to Prepare for Now That Spring Has Sprung

With spring already underway, humans aren't the only ones that are taking advantage of the nicer weather. Here are some wildlife encounters you may experience and pro tips for handling each:

Unattended young rabbits, deer fawns, and songbirds: Wild parents can't hire a babysitter and it is normal for many species to leave their young unattended for long periods. Never assume young wildlife has been abandoned or orphaned just because you don't see a parent nearby. If your instinct is to stand guard until its parent returns, be aware that wild animals will avoid approaching if a potential predator (i.e., you!) is nearby, to avoid drawing attention to their young. Often the best way to help young wildlife is to leave them alone so their parents can return and care for them.

Young squirrels fallen from their nest: Windy weather during the nesting season puts young squirrels at risk of falling out of their nests. Squirrels mothers don't abandon their young easily and will search the ground for missing young to carry back to the nest. If the whole nest falls out of the tree, a squirrel will build a new nest before retrieving her young, so it's important to give her the time and space to do so.

Foxes, skunks, raccoons or squirrels making themselves at home - in yours: In early spring, wild parents are looking for sheltered, out-of-the-way spaces to raise their young for the season. Crawspaces under buildings can offer a safe and comfortable nursery for foxes and skunks while their newborn young are most vulnerable. Climbing species like raccoons and squirrels may try to access your attic. Even chimneys can become an entry point for flying species like bats and chimney swifts. To avoid having uninvited guests living under or above your building, now is a good time to make repairs to the exterior (e.g., vents, eaves, chimney caps) so wildlife can't find their way in.

Spotting snakes on the move: As cold-blooded animals, snakes rely on temperature for energy to move, so warmer weather means more will be out and about, regardless of the time of year. Most snakes in North Carolina start to become active after several days at or above 60°F, so an early spring means early snake activity while temperatures stay warm. The best way to handle a snake encounter is to give it space. Snakes only bite humans in self-defense, so bites can be prevented by avoiding situations that force a snake to defend itself from you. Never pick up or harass a snake, and avoid surprising one by watching where you step or reach, especially in areas with thick ivy or leaf litter on the ground, or piles of wood or rocks where snakes may be seeking shelter.

Wildlife Rehabilitators Regardless of the wild species you encounter, seek advice from a wildlife professional, such as a licensed wildlife rehabilitator, before moving or attempting to care for any young wild animal to avoid causing unintentional harm. For handling unwanted wildlife encounters, a licensed wildlife control agent may be able to help. When unsure of what to do, call the NC Wildlife Helpline at 866-318-2401 for assistance or visit ncwildlife.org/have-a-problem for answers to commonly asked questions about preventing wildlife conflicts, injured/orphaned wildlife and more.

One Call Could Save Your Life Savings!

Is that individual offering you an investment opportunity licensed to sell securities in North Carolina? Is the investment opportunity itself registered? Know before you sign!

While registration in and of itself is no guarantee against fraud, not being registered is a very big red warning flag.

The NC Secretary of State Securities Division urges you to take five minutes to call their NC Investor Hotline at 1-800-688-4507 to see if the person you have been dealing with - perhaps even for years - is properly registered and/or has a disciplinary history. You can also check to see if the actual investment itself is properly registered.

Pick up the phone and call them. You owe it to yourself and your family to check. And, please also consider sharing this information with your contacts or your social networks. Doing so will help keep your friends and loved ones safe, too. More information can be found at www.sosnc.gov/divisions/securities/for_investors.
