Wingate University to Host World's Strongest Man 2011

As the first ever university to host The MET-Rx World's Strongest Man competition, Wingate University will be in the national and international spotlight later this year when the premier event in strength athletics takes place on the University campus in September and is televised domestically on ESPN as a six-hour program in December and internationally on ESPN2 in 2012.

"We are very excited that millions of people around the world will see what Wingate University has to offer, including our beautiful campus," said Wingate University President Dr. Jerry E. McGee. "As the third ranking NCAA Division II Academic All-America® school in this millennium, we pride ourselves on our strong educational and athletic programs, and know our 600 student athletes and others will enjoy seeing this exciting competition between 32 champion athletes firsthand."

"Having the competition on campus will enrich the educational experience for students interested in our sport sciences and communication programs," said Dr. McGee. "It is a prime example of how Wingate University gives students the tools and support they need to excel in academics and apply that learning toward an extraordinary career and life." McGee added that Wingate students will not only be able to participate as spectators, but also will be able to meet the athletes and see firsthand how an internationally televised sports competition is produced.

Many of the events will be held on the Wingate campus, located 30 miles east of Charlotte on Highway US 74 in the town of Wingate. Wingate is working with the North Carolina Department of Tourism to determine the on-campus sites. Other locations around the state are still being added.

The public will be invited to the events, which will take place at several locations around the campus. A full schedule of events, times and locations will be announced as they are finalized. Contestants will be housed in the Monroe area.

Labor Department Urges Employers to Protect Workers from Heat

N.C. Department of Labor officials urge those who work outdoors to prepare for one of the most dangerous summertime workplace hazards—hot and humid weather. Thousands of workers face the threat of heat cramps, heat exhaustion and heat stroke every summer.

"Employers and employees need to take the hot and humid conditions seriously and prepare for them," Labor Commissioner Cherie Berry said. "For example, they should plan the heaviest work during the coolest part of the day and drink plenty of water. Water is your best friend on a hot and humid day in the North Carolina."

During the hot summer months, safety and health officers will emphasize the effects of the heat to employers and employees. In addition, the department will create public awareness through webinars, advertising, trade publications and educational heat stress materials.

Knowing the signs and symptoms of heat stress can prevent serious injury. Workers such as farmers, construction workers and highway crews know hot weather perils that are out of doors. However, the same dangers can be found on factory floors.

Dehydration is one of the primary causes of heat illness. When the body is unable to cool itself by sweating, several heat-induced illnesses such as heat cramps, heat exhaustion and the more severe heat stroke can occur. It is recommended that workers consume 8 ounces of water every 15 to 20 minutes. Beverages containing caffeine or alcohol are not recommended for hydration purposes.

The Agricultural Safety and Health Act requires growers to provide water and drinking cups in the field, and that is one of the items ASH inspectors look for when conducting field sanitation inspections.
